THE EXHIBITION

BODIES HERE AND ELSEWHERE

Jean-Marc Prevost

The exhibition by Tarik Kiswanson at Carré d'Art, opens with a set of spinning steel sculptures, the Vestibules. These hypnotic objects cause us to lose our bearings and impel us to let go just when the images reflected on the polished metal strips make us aware of our presence in space. Architecturally, a vestibule is an intermediary space that can both signify a possible isolation—we linger on the threshold—and afford a glimpse of other places (we enter and are transported). Our fragmentation thus goes hand in hand with the awareness of our physical presence in space.

"The body is the point zero of the world. There, where paths and spaces come to meet, the body is nowhere. It is at the heart of the world, this small utopian kernel from which I dream, I speak, I proceed, I imagine I perceive things in their place, and I negate them also by the infinite power of the utopias I imagine."¹

We often forget this, but history is inscribed in the body and most of Tarik Kiswanson's works confront us with bodily states. In them we can detect the invisible threads that are constantly at risk of being snapped by the accidents of history. They are the traces of a living memory, of a memory of the body. As Deep As I Could Remember, As Far as I Could See is the title of both his first book of poetry and one of his performances, establishing a correspondence between writing as the work of introspection and the trajectory of gesture conceived as an act of presence in the world.

In the artist's performances, pre-teens recite poetry while forming constantly shifting constellations. The fragility and the innocence of childhood allow the process of the construction of subjectivity to unfold, because these eleven-year-old pre-teens are singular beings who must invent relations between each other. Likewise, although we will necessarily have our own genealogy (family is central throughout Kiswanson's work), it is also possible for us to belong to a community that we freely choose for ourselves.

Out of Place, his new film, shows a child sitting on a chair in a classroom, falling backwards in slow motion. This extremely drawn-out movement conveys the danger of losing balance but also the intense beauty of the moment. We are witnesses to an accident but, paradoxically, the movement is nourished by all the things that constructed it, like each person's journey through time and space.

In her book The Human Condition, Hannah Arendt associates the event of birth with the idea of renewal, the unexpected, and the capacity to change the world. In this sense, giving birth can be an eminently political action. The sculptures of children either standing or in a fetal crouch, project us into a world that is rich in possibilities. The specular surface that covers their eyes makes them blind. Rather than absorbing images of the world, their pupils send everything back inwards, just as they reflect us. In a twin movement, they are turned towards the depths of consciousness and confront us with our own representation.

When we think who we are, we usually think of a unified subject. In the present. An inimitable entity. [...] We are not what we think we are, but rather a compilation of texts. A compilation of histories, past, present, and future, always, always shifting, adding, subtracting, gaining.²

Kiswanson's personal story leads us towards shifts between one language and another, between Arabic, Swedish, English, and French. Now, each language carries its own set of corporeal representations that help define distinctive relations to the world. To think in Swedish, to speak in Arabic or French; it is already a singular trajectory. In one of the artist's recent films, The Reading Room, a child seems to be learning to read in front of the Edward Said archives at Columbia University. In the end, perhaps, poetic language could be a way of escaping the determinations of language in its relation to the real.

Beyond language, the function of clothing as finery is to introduce the body into the world of signs. The artist's research at the Tiraz Foundation in Jordan, which holds one of the largest collections of Middle Eastern and Central Asian traditional garments, encouraged him to weave together the threads of an ancestral tradition whose memory later generations have lost. The series Passings is a series of large-scale X-rays that combine clothes of the past with clothes of the present—the sportswear worn by adolescents, its brand logos transformed into signs of community identity, as seen in most European suburbs.

Kiswanson's work bring layers from the past back to the surface of the present. They reach out to grasp the moment, always informed by memory and linked to the context in which it is inscribed. An idea of relations, between the personal and the space we have in common.

PERFORMANCE

The Ear That Hears Me, 2017

Tarik Kiswanson's performance The Ear That Hears Me (2017) activates his monumental Father Forms (2017) and Vestibules (2016): slender, cocoon-like sculptures comprised of thin, highly polished strips of steel. The Ear That Hears Me is one of Kiswanson's earliest performances with preadolescents that takes visions and spatial sensations from childhood as its starting point. Two performers drift between the sculptures as if migrating between nests while reciting poetry related to coming of age, senses of home, and the human condition. The interplay between the writing, sculptural work, and performer foregrounds the notion of extreme presence as a form of transcendence. Within the logic of the performance, the Father Forms becomes a portal, a vessel for a trance-like experience. Upon entering the sculptures, the performer is multiplied, obliterated, and disjointed by his multiple reflections. This sensation is amplified by the profound sonority of the work—it's an experience that envelops the entire body. When set in motion they spin open like the skirt of a meditating Sufi dervish. Evocative, quasi-hermaphroditic forms, these sculptural vessels blur the boundaries between inside and outside, opening and enclosure, the individual and the collective providing an unstable, decentered setting.

NEXT EXHIBITION

NAIRY BAGHRAMIAN COUDE A COUDE

April 8 – September 18 2021 (initially scheduled for summer 2020)

Over the last two decades, Baghramian has created sculptures, photographic works, and drawings that explore the relationships between architecture, everyday objects, and the human body while challenging preconceived ideas of functionality, decoration, abstraction, domesticity, and feminism. Baghramian's sculptural work proudly displays protuberances and cavities, blobs and spills, limbs and prosthetics, to put under pressure traditional questions of volume, mass, form, and theatricality that have shaped the history of sculpture.

Her works are drawn from materials as diverse as steel, glass, silicon, resin, cork and leather, and often allude to familiar objects abstracted and reconfigured in precise and innovative new forms, conjuring through their reinvention fragments derivative of various fields of association –from the anthropomorphic and industrial, to fashion, theater or interior architecture, their history and the ideological undercurrents hold particular interest for the artist.

For her first museum exhibition in France titled Coude à Coude, Baghramian enters into a dialogue with the architecture of Carré d'Art with a selection of works specifically formed for this exhibition. Spanning several exhibition rooms the walls, thresholds and passageways of the display parcours become living protagonists as well as the works themselves. If the sculpture usually presents itself autonomously from its surroundings and uses the exhibition space like a pedestal, Baghramian reaffirms the marginal, the liminal and the transitional sites of space, attaching her sculptures to the architectural structure of the institution and questioning conventional connotations of spatial perception and its hierarchies. The work Das Hübsche Eck, 2006, for example, directs its mirrored side of a screen-like structure to the partition wall of two exhibition rooms, while on the back an enigmatic staircase leads into this very wall that obscures the view. Grosse Klappe, 2008 similarly, is neither boundary nor threshold, occupying the virtual line between two spaces, whereas French Curve, 2014 Off the Rack, 2014, and Dwindler, Low Tide, 2017 utilize extremities to wind their way fluidly from one room to another. And in the earliest work, on view, Trennwände mit Ohrringen (Anna, Martha, Vartuhi) (Partitions with Earrings (Anna, Martha, Vartuhi), 2004) reverses expectations with structures dressed of fabric, the metal becoming the accessory.

Nairy Baghramian b. 1971 in Isfahan, Iran is a visual artist living and working in Berlin since 1984. Her work has been the subject of monographic exhibitions in an array of institutions, including MUDAM, Luxembourg (2019); Museo Reina Sofia, Madrid (2018); SMK, Copenhagen (2017); Walker Art Center, Minneapolis (2016); S.M.A.K, Ghent (2016); Museo Tamayo, Mexico City (2015); Museo Serralves, Porto (2014); the Art Institute of Chicago (2014). Baghramian also participated at Skulptur Projekte Muenster (2017 / 2007); documenta 14 in Kassel and Athens (2017); Lyon Biennale (2017); Berlin Biennale (2014 / 2008); 54th and 58th Venice Biennale (2011/2019).
